The guard is large and muscular. His punch powerful enough to have made a dent in the door. That strength alone makes him a danger.

He charges you, and you roll out of the way. His attack was fueled more by fury than by strategy and he rams into the railing. You kick him.

You're strong. He goes backward, over the railing, and just barely manages to grab one of the rungs. He is dangling over a sheer drop and you can see the panic in his eyes. "Help! Help me!" he screams at you.

- I leave him there. I don't care if he lives or dies.
- I pull him up. It would be cruel not to. I can make sure he won't be able to follow me afterwards.
- I pry his fingers off the rung, forcing him to fall. I can't leave him alive and risk him talking.

But word has leaked there's a mole, and you're running out of time.

Can you depend on your computer hacking skills to get you out of a tight spot or will you count on your brawn? Would you rather sneak where you shouldn't be found or bluff your way in with pure charisma and charm? And what about those friends you've made while undercover? Can they be trusted, or would you rather just use them? Cover your tracks, delay the mole hunt, and plot your escape.

Just two months ago they saved your life on a dark, winding mountain road in Cuba. Earlier that evening you had infiltrated a secret military base, and stolen confidential files. That night, you were thirty minutes away from your extraction point on the beach, heading back to the US.

You had glanced up and seen headlights in your rearview mirror. They weren't going particularly fast, and you couldn't see anything of the car through the darkness, but your instincts told you something was wrong.

- I swerved my car around and pulled out my gun.
- I sped up.
- I abandoned the car and climbed down the mountain on foot.

He leads you through the party and past security guards, who don't even glance in your direction. The noise of the party slowly fades as the two of you head upstairs, down a hall, and through a door. You find yourself in a mahogany-walled room. There's a pool table in the center of the room, a bar stocked with every kind of alcoholic drink imaginable, and rows and rows of bookshelves.

Karl pours you both a drink and then reclines on a leather sofa. "And this," he says, as if he's been giving you a tour all along, "is the den. Rather nice, isn't it?"

You're painfully aware of how close you are to your goal. But you have to decide what to do about Karl first.

Why not have some fun? I'll kill a few hours with Karl until there are fewer people around to get in my way.

I'll have a drink and then make up an excuse.

I'll slip something into his drink that will knock him out. He'll never know what hit him.

Now that you have the information you need, you have to decide what to do with Ricardo.

If you let him walk, there's no telling what he'll say to Acker. The DTU could take him and you wouldn't have to worry about that anymore, but then the more information you have that the DTU doesn't, the better your ability to control the situation.

You could always just kill him and be done with it.

"I can offer you money," Ricardo says, as if reading your thoughts or perhaps merely sensing your hesitation. "Let me go and I'll make it worth your while. Five million, wired to an offshore account."

- I'll hand him over to the DTU.
- I'll let him walk.
- Take the bribe.
- I'll kill him.

If you enjoy "Choose your own Adventure" text games, then I think you will like this. It's much better than "Choice of Robots," and kept me interested throughout the entire play-through. Of course the fun of this sort of game is that you want to play it more than once, so you can try all the different twists and turns; each decision you make unlocks a new path or chapter. For example, in my first playthrough I betrayed the beautiful scientist, but in another attempt I might romance her. And there's plenty of Achievements for you Cheevos-hunters out there, and it's easy enough to get 100% if you simply try all the choices at least once. Bottom line: well worth getting, especially during the Winter Sale, as I did.
